

get a life – employ a concierge!

With today's hectic pace and the increasing demands placed on our time, busy people are looking for ways to improve their lifestyle and regain their elusive free time.

AUSTRALIANS ARE now earning more money than before, but are working longer hours and becoming time poor. As a result, many people are prepared to trade time for money, by outsourcing tasks they aren't interested in or don't have time for. These include household administration, organising holidays and general errands.

While some might say this is a luxury, it's simply an extension of having a cleaner or gardener, according to Adele Blair of Blair Lifestyle Management. "A personal concierge is the ultimate in outsourcing for both corporate and domestic duties," Adele says.

"A concierge can extend to the corporate environment where services tend to be relocations, sourcing client gifts, coordinating functions and general administrative services."

In many households both partners work equally long hours and find it difficult to keep up with both work and domestic obligations.

This is where a concierge can assist, by providing valuable services including personal shopping, decluttering and sourcing and supervising tradespeople.

Adele provides such concierge services. "I specialise in providing personal management services for busy people, in turn creating more time for clients to do the things they really enjoy in their regained free time."
